Questions:

1. How can you apply your Ignatian values to promote human dignity?

I can apply my Ignatian values to promote human dignity by doing even the basics of things. By simply following God's teachings and being a person for others, I can respect and uphold everyone's dignity. Our human dignity is a gift God had given us at birth, therefore it should be honored and protected at all costs. Because at the end of the day, we are all made in God's image that has shaped us into who we are today, due with equivalent respect for all.

2. When was the time that your freedom was used to become unloving to yourself, others, and God?

If I were to recall a time that my freedom was explicitly used to the point where I became unloving to not just others, but myself also, it would probably be when I was utterly struggling with mental health. I honestly lost my faith in myself, in people, and in him. I was rude to people, i shut them out, even if they tried to help me deal with it and believe again. I felt guilty, but my pride took over and gaslighted myself into thinking that i did not need them, that i only needed myself to be able to work normally and live. I used my freedom to say hurtful words, and broke my relationships with people and God.

3. What did you do to transform and amend yourself and become a more loving person to others?

What I did to try and fix myself was that after realizing that this could really not go on, i tried controlling myself more. My words, actions, thoughts, etc. I tried to think about its consequences and how it would affect people more, despite my pride always trying to take over. I told myself it was for the better, so that I could fix myself, and my relationships with people and God. It was not easy, I honestly felt more miserable and felt like I was betraying myself. But with time, i was slowly able to adjust to the standards and limitations i set for myself so that i could once again be a person for and with others.
