An individual in my family who has experienced migration is my elder brother, Jay. He migrated to Malaysia around 2021 to continue his studies overseas. He underwent temporary migration, wherein he would only stay there until he graduates and then return back to his home country afterwards. His main push factors at home were limited university slots and specialized programs, while the pull factors drawing him to Malaysia were its affordable, quality education, multicultural environment, and close proximity to home. Living abroad forced Jay to deal with homesickness and culture shock, while our family had to adjust emotionally to his absence and manage his tuition expenses. However, this journey also allowed him to build international connections and gain a broader global perspective.

This personal experience connects directly to the concept of globalization, which is the increasing interconnectedness of countries through the movement of people, culture, and ideas. Driven by easier travel and international academic partnerships, globalization allows students like Jay to gain knowledge abroad and eventually bring those skills back home. His story also touches on the main dimensions of globalization: the cultural dimension through experiencing a new way of life, the economic dimension through international tuition and living expenses, the political dimension through student visas and migration laws, and the technological dimension, which allows us to stay connected with him through video calls every day.

Ultimately, Jay's temporary stay in Malaysia shows how global trends impact local lives. What started as a personal decision to pursue better educational opportunities became a practical demonstration of how interconnected our world has become. Through the combination of push and pull factors, cultural adaptation, and modern technology, his student journey reflects the true nature and dimensions of globalization today.
